Originally home to the Fuller Company, since 1910, this building was nothing more than a bland storage warehouse that resembled a box. Situated in the Pearl District, it's been renovated into an award-winning design that occupies six floors and 148,000 square feet.

Not only is this space home to various shops, restaurants and galleries, but the internationally acclaimed advertising agency Wieden + Kennedy. The interior design includes a penthouse and an atrium that runs through all five floors of the building, with stadium seating at the base. The Oregon Historic Preservation Office oversaw the design to make sure it was true to its original structure and fabric. The design is also a model for other office spaces that are environmentally sustainable. Their guidelines demanded the use of existing heavy building frames and many other recycled materials. Also implemented was the city's first low-pressure underfloor air distribution system. Due to energy efficiency, Wieden + Kennedy saves almost 470,000 kWh and more than $21,000 per year.

One can see why it won the BEST (Business for an Environmentally Sustainable Tomorrow) award for energy efficiency. When this building was first renovated it served as a catalyst for the redevelopment of many other buildings in the Pearl District and it still gains national attention for innovation today.
